

Review of the Wake Up Beautiful Cleansing Balm by Pacifica Beauty

I'm aware that as I get closer to 40, I need to follow a stricter skin-care regimen. Because I used to have acne and bad skin, I've tried a lot of concealers and eye creams in the hopes of finding one that works. Although I have sensitive skin and have always taken precautions to restrict contact to the sun, the effects of time, worry, and dehydration have begun to show on my face.

Despite my best attempts, the combination of reoccurring acne patches and red, blotchy, dry places made it tough for me to get through this period of transition. I reduced my retinol usage (to once every three or four days) to address my dry, unbalanced face.

When I was about to stop using high-strength retinol treatments, I discovered Pacifica's "Wake Up Beautiful Cleansing Balm," which performed wonders to undo the damage caused by the frequent breakouts, dry patches, and overall "purging" of my face. I had soft skin every morning, which seemed to help with the breakouts.

I chose this particular object for that reason. This product still contains retinol, even though it's in a weaker version than the one I was previously using. I decided to give it a shot after reading numerous encouraging reviews. Chaga fungus, quinoa, sunflower oil, floral extracts, and the aforementioned topical melatonin are additional ingredients.

I started using Pacifica's Wake Up Beautiful Cleansing Balm every day after purchasing some. The results surprised me because my skin suddenly became velvety and supple. precisely why not? I made the decision to purchase a second bottle of this washing balm so that I could use it as the base for my serum. Now that it has become so crucial to my regimen, I can't image ever not using this cream.